

THE HOUSE.

IN WHICH

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

DIED, 516 10TH STREET,

OPPOSITE FORD'S THEATRE.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The House in Which Abraham Lincoln Died, 516 10th St., N. W.

The Memorial Association of the District of Columbia, leased this House and secured the Oldroyd Lincoln Memorial Collection, and opened it to the public, Oct. 17, 1893. This Collection has been on exhibition for ten years in the Lincoln Homestead, Springfield, Illinois. It comprises about 2,500 articles connected with the life of Lincoln from his earliest days to his death. A number of valuable articles have been added to the Collection since its arrival in Washington, among which, is the rocking-chair in which Mr. Lincoln sat when shot by the assassin; the tall silk hat worn by him to the theatre on that fatal night; the old family Bible that belonged to his parents and from which his mother so often read to him and from which he acquired his marvelous familiarity with the English Scriptures. It is impossible to enumerate all the memorials contained in this house, but it is surely full of memories that are dear to the American people, and anyone spending an hour or more amid these historic relics will be richly repaid. The three rooms in the house that contained many anxious hearts may be seen in almost the same condition as they were on that eventful night, April 14th and 15th 1865. Mrs. Lincoln occupied the front parlor with several ladies, occasionally going to the bedside of the President, while the back parlor was used by Members of the Cabinet, leading Statesmen and officers of the Army, who made frequent visits to the death chamber, which was on the same floor at the end of the hall. An admission of twenty-five cents is required, to assist in defraying the expenses until such time as the Government provides for its keeping.
